BITS OF HISTORY. Curions Facts About Swearing Vice Presidents Into Office. More than once in our history the vice president has been sworn and inducted into office sooner than the president, says the St. Louis Globe Democrat. This was the case of John Adams, who took the oath and became president of the senate and vice president of the United States nearly a month before Washington's first inauguration; it was the case with Millard Fillmore, who, it is said, took the oath on Sunday, March 4, falling on that day of the week in 1849, while Taylor, the president-elect, being a rigid Sabbatarian, did not permit himself to be sworn until Monday. It is said that in 1877, when March 4 again fell on Sunday, Wheeler, the vice president-elect, took the oath on that day, while Hayes, having religious scruples, put off the matter until Monday. Of these cases, however, the most peculiar was that of 1789, when, the gov ernment having just been put in operation, presented the curious spectacle of a vice president without a president. At the time, however, the matter seems to have atteneted little attention or remark, and is now remembered only as a historical curio.
